What if every adult on the planet passed out and it was up to the world’s teenagers to figure out why? That’s the question asked by DUST, an alternate reality game created in 2015 especially for teens by a team of BYU students and mentors, along with faculty and students from the University of Maryland and NASA scientists.

The game introduces players to a fictional world where a meteor shower has dispersed clouds of dust into the atmosphere of the Earth, causing adults to fall unconscious worldwide. Using skills from STEM-based fields (Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics), players of STEM-based fields (Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics) work together to gather knowledge, connect and compare ideas, and research and propose solutions as they are given new revelations and clues.

In addition to its focus on STEM concepts, the game follows an immersive storyline that plays out over 6–8 weeks and incorporates media channels including print, video, websites, and social media to give players a rich and transformative online learning experience. “What’s great about DUST,” Jeff Sheets, director of the Laycock Center for Creative Collaboration, explains, “is that it takes the same technologies that are often seen as a distraction and transforms them into platforms for learning.”

DUST launched last year and was a featured topic at the Orem Public Library’s Research Revolution 2015 series. It is now on its way to becoming a standalone game for educators to run in classrooms and after-school clubs. To assist in the feedback and development process, the library is inviting teens ages 12–18 to come and play DUST at our first after-hours teen event of the year on Saturday, January 30, at 7:00 pm (doors open at 6:30 pm). To reserve your spot at this event, contact Marilee at 801-229-7247 or mclark@oexam.org.

The goal of DUST is not only to get teens engaged with and exploring STEM-based subjects, but to have teens discover the excitement and wonder of science as they gain real-life experience in learning how scientific thought and inquiry work. According to Derek Hansen, BYU professor of information technology, the game’s real strength is “that you can’t solve it on your own . . . . It’s played as a community and you need others to help you produce solutions similar to how actual science unfolds.” Researchers also hope the new game—through its use of group interaction, story elements, and lead characters of multiple races and backgrounds—will encourage minorities and girls to find and pursue more interests within the fields of STEM.
